GREAT BRITAIN AND AMERICA.
 (From the Times)
 In the way of concession and of argument on the Oregon question, little new remains to be said or done by the British Government. The strongest desire has been repeatedly expressed on our side to terminate this controversy. Our case has been stated with such moderation, and our claims confined to such narrow limits, that nothing but extreme presumption, or rather a species of hostile insinuation, on the part of the American Government, could lead them to suppose we should make any further abatement of our rights. We are in actual possession of rather more of the Oregon territory, than we have ever claimed as our own, because as long as the joint occupation lasts the concurrent rights of both parties extend over the whole country. We have no disposal except in case of defaulting our rights. We had never, at any period in the history of the country, any reason to recede from a view or to fear the result of a contest with any Power, but more especially with the United States. Yet we, on our side, have strenuously and unwearily laboured to effect a compromise. We have not allowed by the superiority of our position, strengthened by a misapprehension of the American Government, no time has been made of those ideas, arguable to which, at any time, they may appear to be susceptible of success. We have been well contented that our dispute, that Mr. Polk and his cabinet are wading in a course which can only lead to a war, and that we are in possession of the Oregon territory, and that we are in possession of the Oregon territory, and that we are in possession of the Oregon territory.
